

A widow with one daughter was always warning her that she must get a good hunter for a husband. When a young man had come a-courting and claimed he was a good hunter, they got married.

When the young man, day after day, spent all day hunting and only brought back small fish and a handful of scraps, the girl grew suspicious and followed him through the woods until he came to the river, where he changed into a hooting owl.

When he returned home she said, "I thought I had married a man, but my husband is only a owl." She drove him out of the house. The owl went into the woods and there he pined away with grief and love until there was no flesh left on any part of his body except his head/
